Message from the Diocesan Bishop

The Ebola virus epidemic in Africa is a growing and scary concern for everyone. Such a crisis in any corner of the world is a matter of anxiety for people everywhere. As children of God, we are expected to reach out to our less privileged fellow beings with the love of God. Such outreach has its challenges and risks. We must note that Dr. Kent Brantly and Mrs. Nancy Writebol went to Liberia in West Africa as missionaries to serve with love and in obedience to the command of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Questions may arise as to what extent one can sacrifice one’s life for the cause of helping others. To a Christian, there is no limit! The needs of the other will become more important than one’s own needs. Jesus is our role model. He emptied Himself for the salvation of all of humanity. Others like St. Stephen (the first martyr), and Father Damien (who gave his life by identifying and serving with lepers), have touched the conscience of the whole world through their selfless sacrifice. One’s life is fulfilled and content when, like a ship, they sail through turbulent waters and face the storms rather than staying safe at a harbor. God-given talents are to be used for the benefit of all. Dr. Brantly and Mrs. Writebol are to be perceived as such moral leaders who have selflessly labored on the front lines of the Ebola epidemic, thereby serving Africans and everyone else alike.

I was tremendously impressed when Dr. Bruce S. Ribner of the Emory University Hospital said that it is his primary responsibility to serve the two Ebola victims, brought from Liberia to Atlanta, in the best way possible and with the best medicines. I was touched when I read that two medical nurses cancelled their vacation plans and came back to attend to these individuals at the Emory University Hospital. Protecting life and adding more to life are Christian virtues. A ministry of catering to the humanitarian needs and global interests paves the way to redeem the world.

“Do Something” Mission Activity by Northeast Region Youth Fellowship

The Northeast Region Youth Fellowship initiated a mission activity named, “Do Something,” in New York City, which has almost 80,000 homeless people; the highest in any city in the entire United States. The region’s youths decided to go into the city once in a month to work amongst the homeless people. Every month the New York Rescue Mission provides their facility from where our youth operate. The mission work extends to four areas: Gospel meetings, cooking and serving, hygiene awareness, and medical assistance. 25 youth volunteers participate in the mission work each month. This mission activity is organized by the youth, funded by the youth, and conducted by the youth and has been in operation for the past three months, thereby extending the love of God to many homeless people in New York City.
